WASHINGTON LETTER.

The Potency of Women in Shaping the Affairs of a Great and Prosperous Nation.

How the State of Mississippi Escaped Negro-Rule through the Intervention of a Woman.

A Glimpse of Washington Society in Ante Bellum Times - Two Fashionable Cliques.

WASHINGTON, March 19 - The story current that Postmaster-General Vilas, when the oath of office was administered, being somewhat abashed, held the bible in his trembling hand and kissed his astonished wife, who was watching with fearful intensity of interest the induction of the husband into office, recalls me of incidents showing that women in Washington have often shaped the country's fortunes.

Y u will remember that the constitution of Mississippi as amended by its former in 1868, in conformity with a reconstruction act, contained a clause disfranchising every citizen of that hapless commonwealth who had held civil or military office under the Confederate government.

Advised, during the evening, of Butler's purpose, Gen. Dugan and ex-United States Senator Brown, hurried to the residence of Judge Dent Grant's brother-in-law, Mrs. Dent, an admirable woman, in a mission to explain to her the two self-constituted representatives of the people of the state, each of the Southern states to the abolition.

They soon gained access to President Grant, who prepared that night a special message to congress, insisting that action on the Mississippi constitution be deferred until he could investigate facts incident to its creation. He then advised the resubmission of the proposed constitution to the people, enabling them to vote separately upon this instrument and the clauses disfranchising Confederate army and civil officers.

other, and as intimated as decent respect for social sensibilities would render possible - Douglas was eagerly sought to be drawn into identification with both these fashionable coteries. Admiration was a most fascinating woman. Her associations were with the northern branch of Washington society. She was induced by the hope of...

SHINING IN THE WHITE HOUSE. To discard her suit, who, after Douglas' death, wedded her, and accept the hand of the powerful Illinois statesman. I have heard the story that she pursued this course most unwillingly, and that when her original and latest lover called for the last time before her marriage, she had displaced his portrait in her parlor substituting that of Douglas. The lover seeing it and understanding the significance of its presence, crushed the picture beneath his heel and went away without a word. The brilliant marriage was duly celebrated, and the brilliant Southern woman of the capital began the presidential campaign of 1860 against Douglas. They took Judge P. Benjamin, the ardent and facile senator from Louisiana into their service. They employed him to assail Douglas in the senate. They induced him to pronounce that ingenious and extraordinary speech against squatter sovereignty which...
